8 Tips for a Best-Practice Expense Process

And 5 top resources to help you out
8 Tips for a Best-Practice Expense Process
And 5 top resources to help you out

Why follow a best-practice expense management process?
We understand that while most companies would like to adopt best practice procedures it can be hard to a) know what best practice is and b) know how to replicate it or implement it. So here’s a guide that will help.

This guide provides eight tips that will make submitting, approving and reimbursing expenses more efficient, more appropriate and less frustrating. It also lists five helpful resources to help you out.

Tip 1. Start with a firm, fair expenses policy
Having a fair, clear and unambiguous policy is the start of any best-practice expenses process. Moreover, companies have an obligation to create a policy to demonstrate to themselves, and to the IRS, should they enquire, that the expenses being reimbursed are genuine, and that the organization is not reimbursing individuals for inappropriate or personal expenses.

All too often, an expense policy is an afterthought that may not be properly aligned with the business. It does the job, but it may not be clear, fair or appropriate. Ideally, employees should not have to read a 30-page document before they book a flight. The key is to review and update your policy regularly – then, publicize it internally and explain it clearly. This is crucial because as research by Concur discovered, and a recent Amadeus poll confirmed, approximately half of employees say they don’t even understand their policy!

Tip 2. Keep the processes simple
When it comes to expenses, the old acronym – KISS (Keep It Straight and Simple) – applies. Keep your process straight and simple, and people are more likely to comply. If your systems are bogged down with layers of administrative complexity such as triplicate forms and pre-approval, it’ll have a demoralizing effect on your employees and tie up precious man-hours.

Worst of all, having too much complexity can make it more likely to have serious mistakes. By making the process too complicated, companies also run the risk that people may exaggerate their expenses to compensate for the pain of claiming them in the first place.

A process that is both robust and quick helps ensure that the right person approves the expenses appropriately, and that it adheres to the corporate governance.

---

1 Download a free expenses policy template: https://www.concur.com/blog/en-us/need-expense-policy-template
2 Only 51% say they understand their company’s travel policy fully, 47% say the travel department neither helps nor hinders the business, 15% say it is a hindrance: http://www.tnooz.com/2013/01/28/news/amadeus-finds-disgruntled-business-travellers-in-state-of-the-nation-study/
Tip 3. Collect the right amount of (relevant) information

When it comes to the details, the secret lies in the balance. Don't ask for War and Peace. But, having said that, don't simply accept the price and date for each expense item either. Companies ask for receipts not because they don't trust their employees, but because the IRS requires receipts as proof – capturing relevant expense information that will help to ensure there are no delays in administration and help avoid potential problems with compliance later on.

Remember that different expenses can require different information for tax purposes. For client entertainment expenses, for example, it is a requirement to capture the company name and the name of all attendees for tax purposes.

Tip 4. Submit and approve expenses on time

Best practice means having a clear, published timeframe for submitting expenses. It's important to do the right thing by your employees and pay them as quickly as you can, in line with your published payment timetable. However, it works both ways – it's also important to ensure that employees are submitting their expenses within a subscribed time frame. When employees delay filing their expenses, not only does it hurt their pockets, it also can cause cash-flow challenges for the business, and associated accounting nightmares.

Tip 5. Check expenses and make managers accountable

While we advocate swift approval of expenses, it's also crucial that managers have the courage to push back on inappropriate or non-compliant expense submissions. Best practice means making approvers accountable for the application and enforcement of your policy, but, as we said earlier, approximately half of employees say they don't understand their policy – and this goes for managers too. By engaging with the management team and explaining the rationale behind the policy, it is possible to get their buy-in.

Tip 6. Make it easy to submit and approve expenses away from the office

In these days of mobile and global workforces, trying to catch up with someone to approve your expense report is getting harder and harder. If people have to wait and constantly chase their manager, it can lead to delays and frustration.

Allow managers to check and approve expense reports while out of the office. It helps if you can use a tool like Concur that allows approvers to say 'yes, this is okay to pay' while they're out and about; so they can approve reports anytime, anywhere. The beauty of having access on a mobile device is that it's faster to submit and approve expenses on the go.

Tip 7. Audit your processes and receipts

Auditing your processes

How good is your end-to-end expense management process? When was the last time you conducted an audit? Some see expense auditing as an unwelcome intrusion. On the contrary, regular auditing can actually make your expense procedures work better. Auditing can help iron out the glitches in your operational procedures and help to maintain a fair system.

Auditing your receipts

Are you checking that your employees are actually spending what they say they are, and that the receipts match and are valid?
In our experience, we’ve seen everything from brown paper bags being used as evidence for buying juice for a sick colleague, to a photograph of a gas pump being used to justify a mileage claim. These are not valid receipts.

You need to have some guidelines within your processing functions around random audits. You might also choose to audit items that are particularly tax sensitive or items over a certain value.

Tip 8. Pay people on time

Have you ever waited for someone to pay the money they owe you? It’s not fun. Once employees have gone through the process, complied with policy, filled out the right expense forms and attached receipts, it’s only fair to pay them on time.

Plus if people know they’re going to be waiting for their money, they may think twice about making those valuable trips that build your business.

It’s important to pay employees’ expenses in line with the published payment schedule. Ideally, payments should go straight into the employee’s bank account, or directly to settle their corporate card bill, on a timely and reliable basis. If people are paid when they expect it, they can budget appropriately. Prompt payment can also improve morale and productivity.

Need help? Top 5 resources to improve your processes

Take a look at these helpful resources published from Concur.

1. An expenses policy template
2. An expenses trends infographic
3. Concur Travel and Entertainment Spend benchmark report
4. A blog about combining people, policy and compliance to drive effective behavioural change
5. An overview of Concur Expense

Conclusion

The adoption and consistent application of a best-practice expense process is proven to save time and money while improving your employees’ experience. Moreover, having a best-practice solution that is available online and on mobile devices leverages the investment that companies have already made in existing technology. Lastly, a best-practice expenses process provides access to data for analysis and review that can continue to inform the policy and highlight opportunities for further cost savings.

In conclusion, using a best practice process enables the effective handling of expenditure in a way that is consistent with your policy, your company’s needs and your employees’ needs.

---

About Concur

Concur is a leading provider of integrated travel and expense management solutions. Our adaptable web-based and mobile solutions help companies and their employees control costs and save time. Our systems adapt to individual employee preferences and scale to meet the needs of companies from small to large.

www.concur.com